Some veteran advocates said afterward that for the most part Harbury struck the right balance between telling her personal story and illuminating the legal issues raised in the case. "She largely avoided the typical pitfall of representing oneself, which is a complete inability to appreciate -- and grapple with -- the arguments on the other side," said Roy Englert Jr. of Washington, D.C.'s Robbins, Russell, Englert, Orseck & Untereiner. "She was better than many lawyers who appear before the Court on behalf of clients."
